No 'imminent' attack on Canada, CSIS assures

Canada's spy service reacted to the release of a report filed by Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) director Jim Judd to Security Minister Anne McLellan last November saying an al-Qaeda attack on Canada was "probable." CSIS played down the report obtained by Reuters yesterday, saying that the director's comments were "not referring to a specific or imminent threat." ■

Food exchange group nominated for award

Shelley Wells, executive director of Quest Outreach Society

CURBING HUNGER while saving the environment is about simple math, says the Quest Outreach Society, a local food exchange group which has been nominated for a 2006 Canadian Environmental Award.

"We connect people who have the food with the people who need it. It's as simple as that," says Shelley Wells, executive director of Quest. Wells says the award nomination will help raise awareness for the program that addresses hunger and food waste.

"There should be a Quest in every community," she says. "It's a huge problem."

Although the group rescued $7.1 million worth of wasted food last year, it was still just one per cent of the food that is being thrown away in the Lower Mainland, says Wells.

"I think we know there's food waste and we don't know we can do something about it," she says.

The group's strategy is simple and effective. It prevents waste by collecting mislabelled, almost expired, surplus or freight-damaged food from 235 suppliers in Vancouver. Then it sorts and distributes the food to social service groups in the city.

"We have a no-waste policy," says Wells.

In addition to feeding 45,000 people each week, Wells says the group ships excess and spoiled foods to compost bins in community gardens or to local farms for use as livestock feed, diverting 37 tonnes of surplus food from landfills each week.

"We're being recognized more for our environmental work than our people work, but it's great that we can help both," says Wells.

Winners will be announced on June 5 in Vancouver. For more information on other candidates for the Canadian Environmental Awards, go to www.canadiangeographic.ca.
